

As a student currently working toward my undergraduate degree, I have not yet had the opportunity to complete a formal internship or hold long-term employment. In Nepal, it can be challenging to find job opportunities in the business field without having a degree or professional certification. However, I am actively preparing myself for future opportunities by continuously building my knowledge in business, finance, and management.

As a business major, I have been taking the initiative to learn more about the field through self-study, online resources, and staying updated on global business trends. I regularly read articles, watch educational videos, and engage in discussions with mentors and peers to expand my understanding of topics like financial planning, entrepreneurship, and leadership. This self-driven learning is helping me build a strong foundation so I can take full advantage of internship opportunities once I begin my studies at UW-Green Bay.

While I may not have formal work experience yet, I am eager to apply what I learn in real world settings and gain hands-on experience in the business field. I look forward to exploring internship and job opportunities in the U.S. that will support both my academic and career goals.
